Flight24 Competitor Analysis

Flight24's position against Bangladesh's online flight booking agencies

Prepared for internal use

Scope: Bangladesh market only

August 2026

1. Summary

The clearest finding from this research is not about a rival, it is about Flight24's own visibility. Two separate, independent roundups of the Bangladesh online flight booking market, one a news outlet's list published in July 2025 and another a travel agency ranking, name nine and ten platforms respectively without mentioning Flight24 once. That is a real gap worth addressing directly.

Beyond that, Flight24's own online footprint could not be pinned down with hard numbers during this research. Its Facebook page and follower count did not return usable data, though the site does run a B2B partner app for travel agents (b2b.flight24.co) and is listed as an affiliated brand under Suma Group.

The Bangladesh market itself is crowded: a handful of well-funded, multi-service platforms (GoZayaan, Amy, ShareTrip, Shohoz) bundle hotels, visa, and loyalty programs on top of flights, alongside smaller IATA-accredited specialists such as goFLY and Buy Air Ticket Ltd.

2. Flight24 Business Profile

- Operates flight24.co as its consumer-facing site, with a separate B2B partner app on Google Play (package name b2b.flight24.co), confirming a travel-agent distribution channel runs alongside direct consumer booking.
- Listed as an affiliated brand ("Flight24BD") under Suma Group, the same group that owns Suma International Services and Suma Overseas.
- Has a LinkedIn company page under the name Flight 24 Limited.
- This research could not verify Flight24's Facebook follower count, engagement level, or paid advertising activity. That data likely exists internally and should be pulled directly rather than estimated from outside sources.

Visibility gap. Flight24 does not appear in either of the two independent "top platforms" roundups found during this research (a UNB news feature from July 2025 listing Biman Bangladesh, Shohoz, ShareTrip, GoZayaan, Wego, US-Bangla, Amy, Buy Tickets, and Firsttrip; and a separate ranking listing goFLY, GoZayaan, ShareTrip, Galaxy Travel International, Dynamic Travels, TALON Corp, Obokash, ITS Holidays, Heritage Air Express, and International Travel Corp). This points to a media and search visibility gap rather than a product gap.

3. Competitor List

Ranked by apparent scale and market prominence, based on verified claims. Flight Expert has been left out of this list on purpose: its Managing Director allegedly fled the country in 2025 with customer funds unresolved, the site went dark, and a police report was filed. With its business effectively collapsed, it is not a live competitive threat, even though it was a large player until recently. It appears later in this report only as a cautionary example.

Rank	Competitor	Since	Positioning
1	Shohoz	—	Multi-vertical super-app: bus, train, flight, launch, event, and park tickets. Claims 250 million-plus tickets sold and 10 million-plus users (self-reported).
2	ShareTrip	2013/2014	Positions itself as the market pioneer of unified domestic and international ticketing. Around 711,000 to 745,000 Facebook followers. Claims about $18 million a year in revenue (unverified).
3	GoZayaan	2017	Full-suite OTA covering flights, hotels, tours, visa, and gift cards, plus a genuine loyalty programme called Club Limitless. Claims 500,000-plus monthly users. Runs constant bank-card discount campaigns and active Qatar Airways fare promotions.
4	Amy	2015	Broadest scope of any competitor: flights, hotels, property rental (Amy Homes), visa, eSIM, and Umrah packages. Its "first OTA in Bangladesh" claim is disputed by ShareTrip and the collapsed Flight Expert, who each made the same claim with earlier or competing founding dates.
5	Buy Air Ticket Ltd (BATL)	—	Both B2C and B2B: runs an IATA commission programme and GDS consortium access for other travel agents, alongside its own consumer bookings. Physical office in Dhaka New Market.
6	goFLY	2017	Smaller, IATA-accredited agency built around a price-transparency pitch. Its "no markup, same price as booking direct" claim did not hold up: a documented customer complaint shows a real price gap, and general industry sources confirm IATA accreditation does not by itself prevent markups.

4. A Cautionary Case: Flight Expert

Flight Expert was until 2025 one of the larger names in this market: founded in 2017, reportedly around $18 million a year in revenue at its peak, roughly 450,000 Facebook followers, and both a consumer and a B2B booking arm. In 2025 its Managing Director allegedly left the country, the website went dark, a police report was filed, and customer funds were left at risk. It had also been linked to a murky 2021 acquisition by Evaly, the e-commerce platform that later collapsed under its own fraud allegations.

Flight Expert is not treated as an active competitor in this report, in line with the reasoning above: a business in that state is not competing for bookings. It is worth keeping on file for one reason though. Its collapse was a direct trigger for new government regulation (see below), and it left a trust gap in the market that a reliable, transparent agency like Flight24 could market against directly.

5. Market Structure and Regulation

- Bangladesh has an estimated 5,000 to 5,200 licensed travel agencies, but only around 1,300 hold IATA accreditation. Most agencies operate as sub-agents reselling through an accredited agency.
- A new Travel Agency (Registration and Control) Ordinance, dated 2026, sets a much higher compliance bar for online agencies specifically: a bank guarantee of Tk 1 crore (roughly $85,000), against Tk 10 lakh (roughly $8,500) for offline agencies. This ordinance was a direct response to the collapse of Flight Expert, Fly Far International, and Travel Business Portal.
- Bangladesh's air ticket market is estimated at around $1 billion in size.

This new bank guarantee requirement is worth checking against Flight24's own compliance position soon, since it applies specifically to online agencies and was written in direct response to the same kind of collapse described above.

6. Media Buying, SEO, AEO and GEO

The visibility gap flagged in section 1 is not vague. It shows up clearly across three related channels: traditional search engine optimisation (SEO), answer engine optimisation (AEO, the direct-answer boxes and voice-assistant results search engines pull from a page), and generative engine optimisation (GEO, whether AI chat tools like ChatGPT, Gemini, or Perplexity name a brand when someone asks a related question).

SEO

Several competitors run dedicated, keyword-built pages aimed at specific searches. goFLY has a standalone "Air Ticket Price in Bangladesh" page built around exactly that search term. GoZayaan runs individual route pages, such as its Dhaka to Kolkata and Dhaka to Cox's Bazar pricing pages, each targeting a specific search a traveller would type in. Amy's site is similarly built out with dedicated sections for flights, hotels, visa, and its Amy Homes product. No equivalent structure was found on flight24.co during this research: the site did not surface individual, search-targeted pages the way its rivals do.

AEO

None of the sources checked for this research, including Flight24's own site, showed clear FAQ-style, direct-answer formatting of the kind that gets pulled into Google's featured answers or a voice assistant's response. This is a gap shared across most of this market, so it is also an open opportunity: whichever agency builds this first has a real head start.

GEO

This is the most concrete data point in the whole report. This research itself was produced by an AI-driven process that reads through dozens of web pages to answer questions like "who are Flight24's competitors in Bangladesh." Across that entire process, working from broad searches about Bangladesh flight booking, Flight24 came up only when it was the direct subject of the search, not once when the process was simply looking for "top flight booking sites in Bangladesh" through independent, unprompted searching. That is a live demonstration of the same problem: if a traveller today asked an AI assistant "which site should I use to book a flight in Bangladesh," the honest answer, based on what is publicly available for that AI to draw on, is that Flight24 likely would not be named.

Paid media and campaigns

GoZayaan runs a constant rotation of bank-card and mobile-financial-service discount campaigns as its main acquisition tool, covering nearly every major Bangladeshi bank. Amy and goFLY both lean on EMI financing offers through partner banks as a customer draw. No equivalent, visible campaign activity for Flight24 was found in this research, though that may simply reflect that this kind of activity runs on Facebook and other closed platforms this research could not fully see into. Pulling Flight24's actual ad spend and campaign history internally would give a much clearer picture than outside research alone can.

What this means in practice

- Build individual, keyword-targeted pages for popular routes and fare types, matching what goFLY and GoZayaan already do.
- Add short, direct FAQ content, formatted so search engines and AI assistants can lift it cleanly, since almost no competitor has done this well yet.
- Test regularly what ChatGPT, Gemini, and similar tools say when asked about flight booking in Bangladesh, and track whether Flight24 gets named over time.

- Since Flight24BD and SIS sit under the same group, a shared SEO and content push across both brands is likely more efficient than running two separate efforts. See the companion SIS report for the matching point from that side.

7. Strengths, Weaknesses, and Gaps

Strengths

- NDC-based fare campaigns with airline partners give Flight24 a technical edge that many smaller Bangladeshi agencies do not have.
- A working B2B distribution channel through the partner app, alongside direct consumer sales.
- Backing from an established parent group (Suma Group) with a long operating history in the wider travel sector.
- Positioned to market directly on reliability and transparency, at a moment when the market has just watched a major competitor collapse under fraud allegations.

Weaknesses and gaps

- Missing entirely from two independent "top platforms" media roundups, unlike every other name in the competitor table above.
- No confirmed data on Flight24's own social media reach, engagement, or advertising spend, a real blind spot for benchmarking.
- Narrower service scope than GoZayaan, Amy, or Shohoz, which all bundle hotels, visa, or loyalty programmes on top of flights.
- No loyalty programme or bundled discount campaign structure comparable to GoZayaan's Club Limitless or the constant bank-card offers run by larger rivals.

8. Open Questions for Follow-up

1. What are Flight24's actual Facebook, Instagram, and website traffic numbers, and how do they compare to the 711,000-plus followers ShareTrip and roughly 450,000 Flight Expert once had?
2. Why does Flight24 not appear in independent Bangladesh "best flight booking site" roundups, and is there a straightforward PR or SEO fix for that?
3. Does Flight24 meet the new 2026 online travel agency bank guarantee requirement (Tk 1 crore)?
4. Is there an opportunity to build a short trust-and-reliability marketing angle off the back of the Flight Expert collapse, aimed at customers who are now wary of smaller agencies?
5. What does Flight24's current paid media and ad spend actually look like, and how does it compare to the visible campaign activity run by GoZayaan, Amy, and goFLY?
